Davis, Olsen remembered for greatness on and off the field

CHARLOTTE, N.C. — Thomas Davis and Greg Olsen, two beloved NFL players who developed into iconic figures in the Charlotte community, officially retired together on Thursday as members of the Carolina Panthers.

Davis and Olsen signed one-day contracts with Carolina and were honored jointly during a 90-minute virtual ceremony at Bank of America Stadium that was broadcast live on the team’s website.

“For the people here in Carolina, you guys are family — and I’m glad you guys came back home today,” Panthers owner David Tepper said.

Davis spent 14 of his 16 NFL seasons with the Panthers and is the team’s franchise leader in tackles with 1,258. Olsen spent nine of his 14 seasons in Carolina, finishing with 742 receptions for 8,683 yards, both fifth-most in NFL history among tight ends.

But their success on the field was superseded by their reputation for giving back to the Charlotte community.

Davis was the Walter Payton Man of the Year award recipient in 2014, while Olsen was selected as a finalist for the award in 2017 and 2018.

Davis started the Defending Dreams Foundation, which strives to encourage students to develop the essential life and social skills that will make them leaders of the community. Olsen created the HEARTest Yard Fund foundation along with Atrium Health to help other families after his son T.J. was diagnosed early in his life with a congenital heart condition.

“They understand there is more to life than just football,” said

Washington Football Team coach Ron Rivera, who coached both players with the Panthers. “They both used their platforms for positive impact in the community.”
